The first commercial cell phone was developed by Motorola in the 1970s. It was big, weighed 2 kilograms, and it could only make calls. But as with all useful technologies, things changed quickly.

By the 1980s, cell phones had become smaller and lighter. At that time, cell phones could only be used in big cities. However, phone companies were quick to expand their networks, which allowed people to use their phones in more remote places.

By the '90s phones had changed a lot. They became “feature phones” that could be used to take photos, send SMS text messages, and even play simple games. Companies like Nokia were the leaders in selling these newer, smaller, and much smarter phones.

By 2010, computer technology and the Internet had really changed the game. We still had phones with a lot of features, but now everything and everyone could be connected on the World Wide Web. A world of convenience became available in a small device. If one thing is for sure, phones are a huge part of our life, and they're here to stay.
