Convenience stores are great. It's easy to pop into one, and they are everywhere. However, convenience stores have not always been around.

Before convenience stores existed, there were local corner stores. Corner shops in England have been around for over a hundred years, selling daily items like eggs, milk, and bread. In Australia, these shops are called milk bars, and they showed up in the 1930s. General stores in America have been around for hundreds of years, selling daily goods, clothes, and farming supplies. In the early days, these shops were wonderful, but they weren't open long hours, and they were only open on certain days.

The first convenience store, the Southland Ice Company, was opened in Dallas, Texas in 1927. The shop was instantly popular because it saved local people time by not needing to travel to faraway grocery stores. The shop went on to develop into the 7-Eleven chain. The name 7-Eleven came from the fact that it was open for long hours, from 7 a.m. to 11 p.m. every day.

Today, many convenience stores are open seven days a week and 24 hours a day. Now that's real convenience!

(D) 1. Which of the following statements about the corner stores is true?

- (A) They are open every day.
- (B) They sell only farming supplies.
- (C) They have been around for less than fifty years in England.
- (D) They are called by different names in different countries.

(A) 2. What can be inferred from this passage?

- (A) The 7-Eleven chain store got its name from its opening hours.
- (B) There were convenience chain stores before 1927 in America.
- (C) Grocery stores were close to where people lived back in 1927.
- (D) The first convenience store in Dallas was open 24 hours a day.

(B) 3. What does the phrase “pop into” mean in the first paragraph?

- (A) To appear suddenly.
- (B) To visit a place briefly.
- (C) To go back into a place.
- (D) To run away from something.
