Derek Redmond was one of the United Kingdom's best athletes during the 1980s. He broke the British four-hundred-meter record twice. He was also a member of the relay* team that won the gold medal at the 1991 World Championships in Tokyo. A year later, his team won a silver medal at the World Championships in Rome.

After these achievements, Redmond decided to continue competing as an individual runner. He competed in the 1992 Olympics in Barcelona, again representing his country. Although he did not win the race because of a serious leg injury, the scene of Redmond slowly making his way toward the finish line, helped by his father, became one of the greatest moments in Olympic history. Even former US president Barack Obama talked about it in an official speech.

His leg injury meant the end of Redmond's athletic career*, but he did not let this get him down. Redmond has played basketball for a professional* team in England and traveled around the country to give speeches, encouraging people to fulfill their dreams.
