There are several reasons that many girls around the world don't go to school. One is poverty. Girls who come from poor families often live in remote villages where there are no schools. To get to a school, they may have to travel long distances on foot. Another reason is child marriage. Girls who marry at a young age complete fewer years of education than girls who marry later. That's because when a girl becomes a wife or mother, she is often forced to stay home and takes care of the family.

In supporting girls' education, we must reduce the distance to schools and convince* boys and men to change their traditional thoughts and beliefs about gender* roles in society. Finally, we must make sure girls can feel safe in school and learn things that will help them get jobs and make money one day.

Better-educated women are more likely to be financially independent, earn higher incomes, and provide better health care and education for their children. Therefore, education for females benefits not only women themselves but their children, which in turn is better for the whole society.
