Did you know that there's a note-taking technique that can help you do better in school? It's called the Cornell method, which was first proposed by a Cornell University professor.

In this famous system, students divide their page into three parts: one for notes, another for cues, and 1. for a summary. The Notes Section is 2. you record important information during class. In the Cues Section, you rewrite your notes with simpler words. You can also write down questions you think the teacher might ask. It should be completed 3. a day or two after class. The Summary Section is filled in after you think about what you've learned. Once you've completed all three sections, all you have to do is 4. your notes each week. This regular revision is likely to help you remember the information better and longer, 5. in turn may help you not only in school but also in your future career. Students are usually told to read carefully when they study. They should also take notes and reread parts of the text that they're not familiar with. Although this is sound advice, it may not be enough.

Some experts say that an important step in the study process is being left out—that is to put the textbook down and try to actively recall what one has read by either writing it down or saying it aloud. According to one study, people who actively recalled the material after reading it were much better at solving problems that involved drawing information from the material than people who simply read the material twice.

When we read a passage in a book over and over, we may think we have learned it. But when that book is no longer in front of us and we have to take a test, we have trouble remembering that knowledge. By challenging the reader to remember what they've just read, active recall may be the most effective way to commit knowledge to long-term memory.
