Astronauts have special jobs. They live and work around four hundred kilometers above the Earth. 1. the extreme environment, their daily routine is not like ours at all.

For a start, the extremely low gravity in space, 2. "microgravity," affects how astronauts eat. Everything floats in space, so eating utensils all contain magnets to keep them stuck to the dining table. 3. they themselves are also able to simply float around, astronauts need regular exercise to keep up their muscle strength. In microgravity, muscles can gradually become smaller in size. Astronauts therefore typically tie themselves to exercise bikes for 4. two hours a day to work out. When it's time to sleep, they fix their sleeping bags to the cabin walls so that they don't end up 5. in the bathroom.

There's no doubt that astronauts have many unusual experiences. It just goes to show how interesting life in space can be.

When we think of astronauts in space, we might imagine exciting activities and adventures. In reality, life in space can be pretty inconvenient and even a little weird.

While astronauts can laugh all they want, they can't exactly cry in space as they do on the Earth. Without gravity, their eyes can make tears, but these remain as liquid balls stuck to their eyes instead of flowing down their cheeks. Astronauts can't take normal showers either. In space, water is scarce* because it's heavy and thus expensive to transport*. Therefore, astronauts must save as much water as possible. In place of showers, astronauts take sponge baths using water gathered from humidity in the air and from human waste.

Speaking of human waste, going to the bathroom in space can be really challenging. First, astronauts must tie themselves up so that they don't float away. They must also make sure that their waste does not float away either! This is just one of the many tricky things that people on the Earth take for granted, which astronauts, however, have to deal with on a daily basis.
