Chi Po-lin's great film, Beyond Beauty: Taiwan from Above, shows us that Taiwan is a beautiful place. However, the film also makes it clear that the island was facing serious environmental problems at the time of filming. Moreover, many of these problems, which Chi filmed between 2009 and 2012, are still very real today.

One major problem highlighted in the film is that of the negative effects brought by hillside farming. Take betel nut farms, for example. Betel nut trees are widely grown in hilly areas in Taiwan. However, their roots do not go very deep into the soil. Therefore, when heavy rains come, these plants are unable to absorb* water quickly or trap soil effectively, causing landslides to become more common.

Another problem is wastewater. Sadly, many factories in Taiwan dump their untreated wastewater into rivers. For instance, the Tamsui River, which runs through Taipei City and New Taipei City, is polluted from raw sewage* and wastewater from many factories. As the film shows, rivers like this flow from the mountains to the sea, taking all the factory pollution with them. All these harmful chemicals wind up in our ecosystem* and harm every form of life.

Sadly, Chi died in a helicopter crash in 2017. He may no longer be with us, but the lessons he hoped to teach us about our environment still remain.
