Is graffiti art? Today, Yasmin and Noel will debate this topic.

Yasmin: Graffiti is obviously art. It takes a lot of time and hard work. Graffiti artists are like other painters.

Their art 16. sketches and is then filled in to make vivid pictures. The only difference is that graffiti artists paint on walls, 17. traditional artists paint on paper.

Noel: I disagree. Most graffiti is simply trash. It’s tagging—people writing their names—and it makes cities look terrible. Plus, it’s usually done without 18., and it costs a lot of money to remove it.

Yasmin: It’s about sharing one’s feelings and being creative. Think about famous graffiti artists like Banksy. His works are about important issues.

Noel: I see your point, but I still think that graffiti harms communities. It can make people 19. unsafe. If it causes problems, can we really call it art?

Yasmin: I can understand your perspective, but not all graffiti is the same. I think we should 20. street artists with people trying to cause harm for fun. It’s important to consider the purpose and message behind the graffiti.

Noel: It’s a complex issue. I guess it’s up to city residents collectively to decide whether they think graffiti is a form of art or just a problem.

What is the best way to stop your house from being torn down? It turns out that the answer might just be graffiti. This seems to be the case for Huang Yung-fu, whose artwork in Taichung has stopped the government from tearing down his neighborhood. Huang lives in military housing that was given to KMT soldiers when they came to Taiwan. Originally there were about 1,200 houses in the village, but over the years, the houses were torn down to make new buildings, and Huang was the only one to stay behind.

Huang was bored and lonely, so he started painting birds and other decorations on the walls of his house. Over time, his paintings filled the house, and he moved outside and covered the streets and walls of the last eleven remaining houses. His graffiti struck a chord with some students who then helped Huang to fight to keep the last eleven buildings from being torn down.

The area, called Rainbow Village or Rainbow Military Community, is a major tourist attraction with about one million visitors a year. It's also a remarkable example of how graffiti can move mountains.

- (D) 31. Why wasn't Huang Yung-fu's house torn down by the government?
- (A) It was military housing. (B) It belonged to the KMT.
- (C) It was on a unique location. (D) It had beautiful artwork.
- (B) 32. Which of the following statements is NOT true about Rainbow Village?
- (A) It is a famous tourist attraction.
- (B) It is a village of 1,200 houses now.
- (C) It attracts about one million visitors a year.
- (D) It shows how graffiti can work wonders.
- (A) 33. What can be inferred from the reading?
- (A) Some students supported Huang's efforts to keep his house from being torn down.
- (B) Huang was so bored and lonely that he drew on his house to make it a tourist spot.
- (C) All KMT soldiers were required to live in the military housing.
- (D) Only local students are attracted by Huang's graffiti in his neighborhood.

Thousands of years ago, cave walls were the first canvases* for human expression; then came the ancient Greeks carving their names and poems on buildings. Modern graffiti began in Philadelphia in the early 1960s, spreading to New York by the late 1960s. But this new type of graffiti really took shape* in the 1970s, when people began writing their names on buildings all over the city or covering walls with spray paintings. By the 1980s, some renowned* graffiti artists changed to using building rooftops and canvases.

This art form has helped many graffiti artists shoot to fame. Jean-Michel Basquiat, for example, made his way from New York walls in the 1970s to global acclaim in the 1980s. Artists like Blek le Rat (known as the Father of Stencil Graffiti) and Banksy (a British street artist) have become big names through their artwork, which aims to make political and social comments. Some graffiti works by these masters have been sold for more than $100,000. For some artists, graffiti is now a lucrative business, bringing in more money than people could imagine.
