The landscape in Taiwan is often described as being beautiful by the media. But until the film Beyond Beauty: Taiwan from Above came out, there wasn't a movie or an article that could present all of that beauty in one place. Even today, years after its release, this film remains one of the greatest documentaries about Taiwan ever released.

The film, made by aerial photographer Chi Po-lin, focuses on the island's mountains, forests, and urban areas. It also shows us the serious environmental problems facing the country. Flying high above the land, Chi filmed areas where many trees had been cut down. He also filmed rivers and other bodies of water that had been polluted by industrial waste.

Music also serves as an important part of the film. Nolay Piho, an aboriginal* musician and actor, wrote some songs and sang them for the documentary. Piho grew up in the mountains, and he said he had really been inspired by Chi's great shots.

For years to come, people will continue to learn a lot about Taiwan and its environment from this amazing documentary.

People pay respect to nature in their own way. Chi Po-lin, a professional photographer, honored his homeland by recording the beauty of Taiwan and the changes it has undergone*. Spending hundreds of hours in a helicopter, Chi produced many stunning aerial photographs of the island.

The biggest turning point of his career as an aerial photographer working for the government came when his photos were published by the magazine The Earth Geographic Monthly. That's when Chi started to realize that his works were actually showing the pollution caused by humans and the resulting damage to the environment. The beauty of his homeland was no longer the main thing he looked for. He began trying to unveil* what the island really looked like.

Like his photos, Chi's films display the extensive* damage that has been inflicted on the island's natural environment. The list below shows us the environmental problems highlighted by Chi's film Beyond Beauty: Taiwan from Above.
