The Statue of Liberty's torch has an interesting history. The statue was supposed to be built in France before being 21. to the US, but its sculptor found that there was not enough money to complete the project. He thus decided to display the arm and torch first at a festival in 1876 in order to 22. attention and raise money. 23. were allowed to climb the torch for twenty-five cents*. For ten years, that was the only part of the 24. that people in the United States would see. Finally, enough money was raised, and the torch, 25. liberty lighting up the world, was put in place at the top of the full statue.

Over time, however, the torch became 26. By 1984, this 27. of freedom had become dark and dangerous. The famous filmmaker Francis Ford Coppola led a campaign* to 28. the torch and replace it with a new one. In 2018, the original torch was put in the Statue of Liberty Museum, which people could 29. to get an up-close view.

Today, Lady Liberty still stands as one of the best-known 30. of New York City and continues to shine. It serves as a sign that freedom requires work from all of us.

(B) The locals gave the statue the nicknames “The Jolly Green Giant” and, more frequently, “The Spirit of Detroit.”

(C) The statue is made up of several parts, and each has its own meaning.

(D) A plaque* sits in front of the statue to bring the ideas all together: “God, through the spirit of man, is manifested* in the family, the noblest human relationship.”

(E) The artist was inspired by ancient myths and legends when creating the statue.

On September 23, 1958, a statue was shown in the center of downtown Detroit, Michigan. A crowd of one thousand people stood there and watched. With its newly dedicated icon, the city seemed to be full of hope. 31.

The Spirit of Detroit was an art piece created to represent the city. It was first made in Norway and took four years to complete. 32. The bronze* monument was twenty-six feet tall and weighed twelve tons. Its creator, the famous sculptor Marshall Fredericks, had worked with other artists to apply acid to the surface of the bronze statue, which gave it its beautiful warm, aged green tone.

33. A god-like giant, he stands for the spirit of humanity, kneeling with his arms stretched out to the sides. In his left hand, he holds up a ball with rays shooting out of it to represent God. In his other hand, he holds up a family, which symbolizes all human relationships. 34.

The Spirit of Detroit is still a popular place to visit. Just like the artist wanted, it continues to inspire people and gives hope and happiness to those who look for it.

Editor’s Note: Lessons Learned in War?

BY JEREMY CULLEN | Thursday, August 8, 2019

It was 11:02 a.m. on August 9, 1945. Suddenly, the bright, sunny sky was overshadowed* by a giant mushroom cloud. The flow of time in Nagasaki seemed to pause. Buildings fell, iron and glass melted, and two-thirds of the residents* were either instantly killed or seriously injured.

More than seventy years have passed, yet the wounds have never fully healed. In the Peace Park (Heiwa Park), several statues stand in the rising sunlight and warm breeze. Among them is a bronze* statue depicting* a mother carrying her newborn baby. The baby looks helpless during the atomic bomb attack. The vivid flowers on the mother’s dress symbolize the beauty of life and the hundreds of thousands of lives destroyed by the war.

Time goes by, but what have we learned?
